INTRODUCTION

When you appoint a financial adviser, they will be very upfront about the initial and ongoing costs of their services.

They will also no doubt have a conversation with you about what you are getting for your money and this article is intended to look at this subject in detail. Firstly, it's worth looking at the components that make up the initial advice that you receive.

These can include:

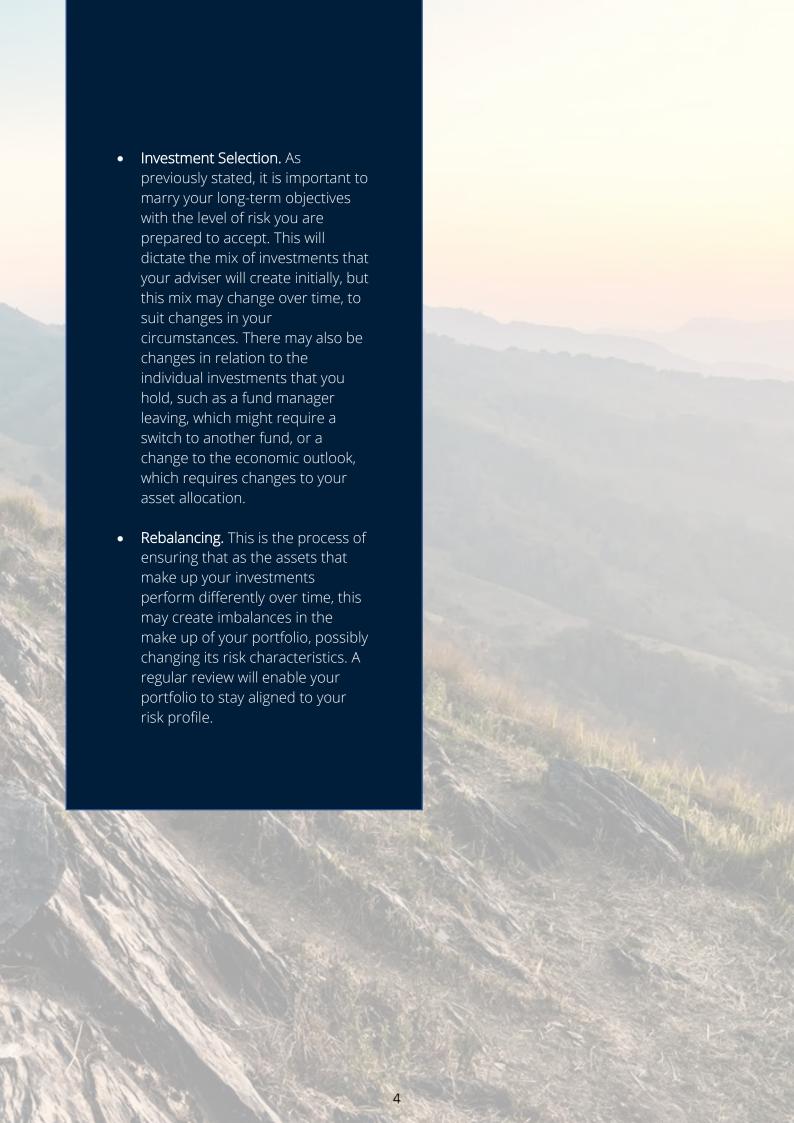

- Identifying your goals and how to achieve them. Every client is individual and it requires a detailed look at your personal circumstances, understanding what you want to achieve with your finances, both now and in the future.
- Assessing your attitude to risk.
 Much of your financial plan will involve risk based investments,
 such as stocks and shares.
 Although these types of investment are proven to be beneficial to investorsover time, their performance can be volatile.
 Assessing your tolerance to this volatility will help to construct a portfolio of investments with which you can feel comfortable in terms of the level of the fluctuations in value over the life of your plan.
- Constructing a financial plan. This possibly involves a variety of complex decisions and combining several products and services, which themselves may be complex
 and may include:
 - o Tax planning. Ensuring you maximise the reliefs and allowances available to you
 - Retirement planning.
 Ensuring that you are maximising the use of your pension benefits.
 - Cash flow modelling.
 Creating a realistic idea of what your finances might look like in the future, if you act on the advice given.

The value of this initial advice is probably easy for clients to understand. There are many hours of work, put in by extremely qualified people, in order to create your financial plan.

What is less understood is the value of the ongoing advice that you receive and how to quantify this. However, as with the initial advice, we can look up the components that might make this and then, in addition, use external sources to look at the value they bring.

The components of this ongoing advice may include:

- Ongoing financial and tax planning. Over the life of your financial plan, many things may change: your personal circumstances, your income and expenditure and tax law are but a few of them. Your regular reviews with your adviser will ensure your plan remains up to date.
- Asset allocation. It is important to look at the asset classes making up your portfolio of investments over time. Your adviser will work with you to ensure that the mix of these assets matches your circumstances. For example, as you enter retirement, it might be appropriate to reduce the number of riskier assets that have helped achieve growth in your portfolio in the past.
- Behavioural coaching. Probably the least understood aspect of your financial adviser's contribution to the long-term success of your financial plan. However, this is arguably the most valuable aspect! As human beings, we are subject to a myriad of emotional and behavioural biases. Whilst useful to us historically in terms of survival, these biases tend to not help in decision making when it comes to our investments, particularly when it comes to market falls. Our separate paper 'The Importance of Remaining Invested' looks at this in more detail. However, in short, your adviser is there to help you to make the right decisions at the right time when it comes to your investments.
- Withdrawal Strategies. It is important to make sure that, if you are withdrawing funds, this is done in a tax efficient manner, as well as ensuring the integrity of your investment strategy is maintained.

ASSESSING THE VALUE OF THE COMPONENTS OF ONGOING ADVICE

So, having identified the components that make up your advisers ongoing services to you, how can we put a value on them for clients? Fortunately, there has been much industry and academic research carried out on this subject. EDVOA (Educating and Demonstrating the Value Of Advice) is an independent website that has looked at much of this research* and consolidated it, in order to determine a value that may be given to each component on an annual basis. The resulting values are:

Financial and tax planning	0.5%
Asset Allocation	0.28%
Behavioural coaching	1.5%
Withdrawal strategies	0.23%
Investment selection	0.45%
Rebalancing	0.35%

When totalled, these components end up at an annual figure of 3.31% which we think helps to put the value of your ongoing advice into perspective and can be balanced against the ongoing fees your adviser might charge you.

THE ONGOING COSTS ASSOCIATED WITH THIS ADVICE

In addition to determining the value of advice, we feel it is also useful to explain what costs advisers incur in order to deliver their services:

- Network fees (these cover the regulatory and ongoing compliance costs of running an adviser firm)
- Office costs
- Personnel costs
- Professional body membership
- Training and maintaining competence
- Travel
- Product research
- Investment research
- Technology and record keeping
- Legal, accountancy and professional services

CONCLUSION

By drawing on external research we hope that clients can now have a good understanding of what benefits ongoing financial advice brings to them and be better equipped to put a value on this advice, whilst also reminding ourselves that providing ongoing advice does come at a cost to the adviser.
